THE RABBIT CHASE

TOM and JERRY

The MOUSE WATCHERS

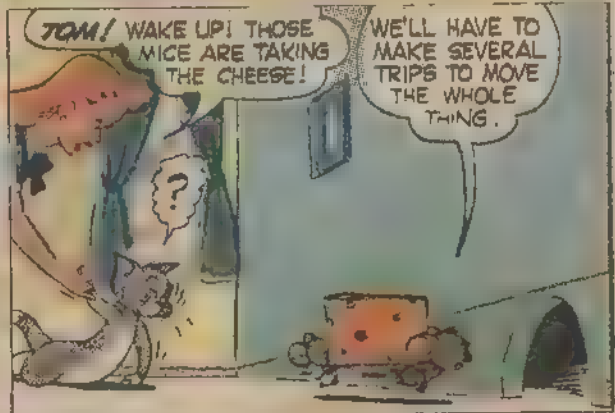

OKAY, TUFFY, THE CHEESE'S CUT. PUSH OUT THE PIECE.

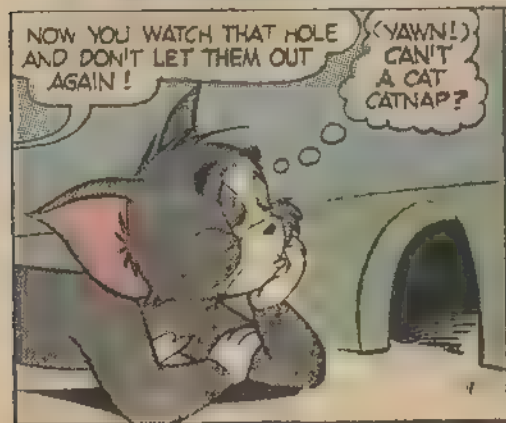

HA, HA! A NICE, SOFT KITTY TO JUMP ON MAKES IT EASY ON THE FEET.

OOF!

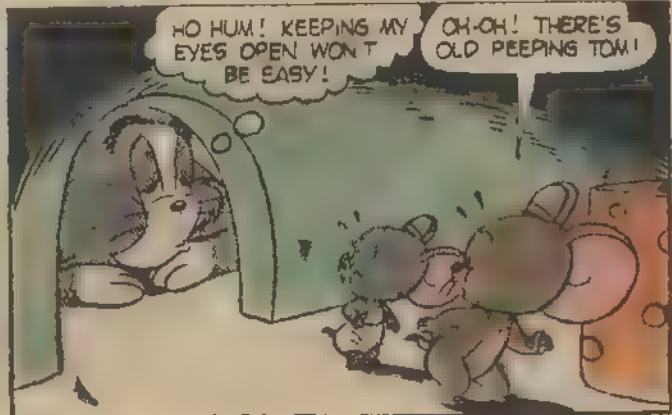

TOM! WAKE UP! THOSE MICE ARE TAKING THE CHEESE!

WE'LL HAVE TO MAKE SEVERAL TRIPS TO MOVE THE WHOLE THING.

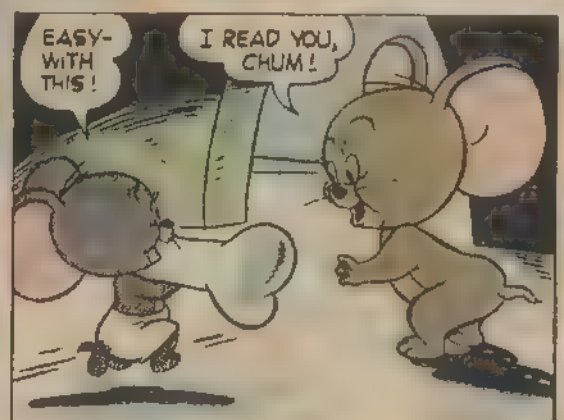

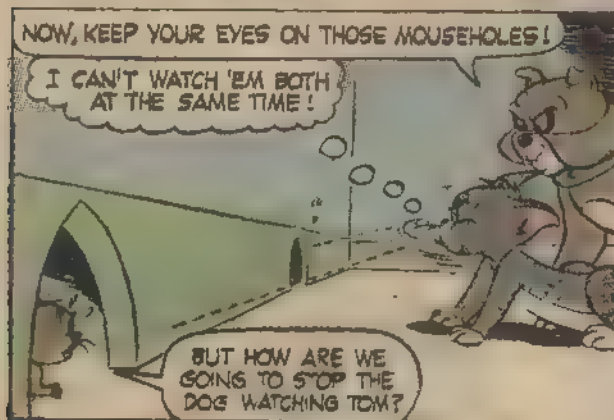

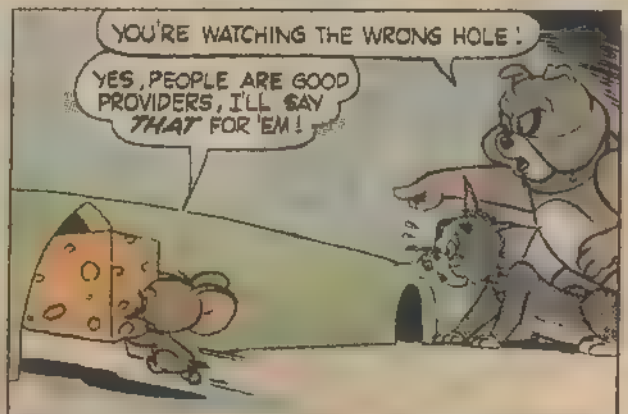

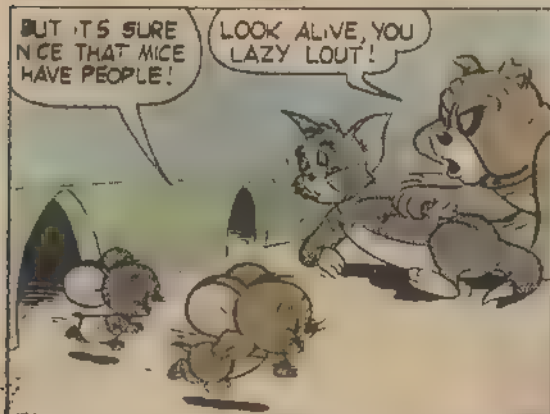

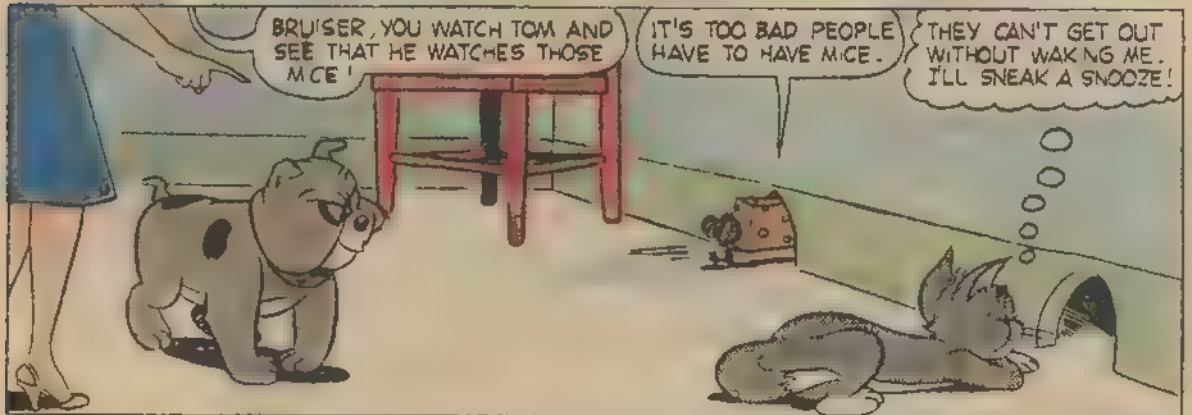

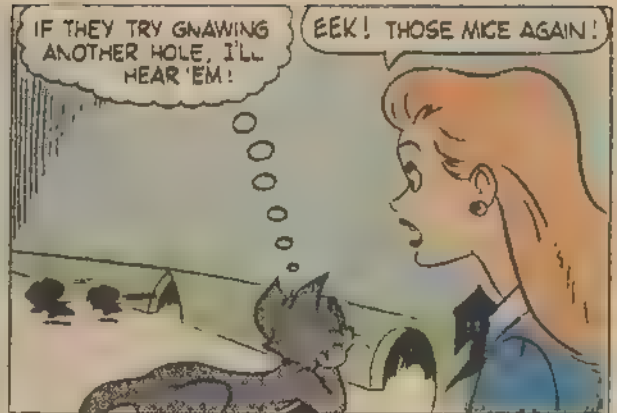

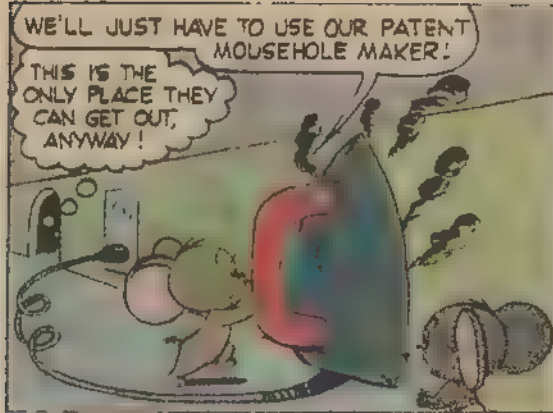

NOW YOU WATCH THAT HOLE AND DON'T LET THEM OUT AGAIN!

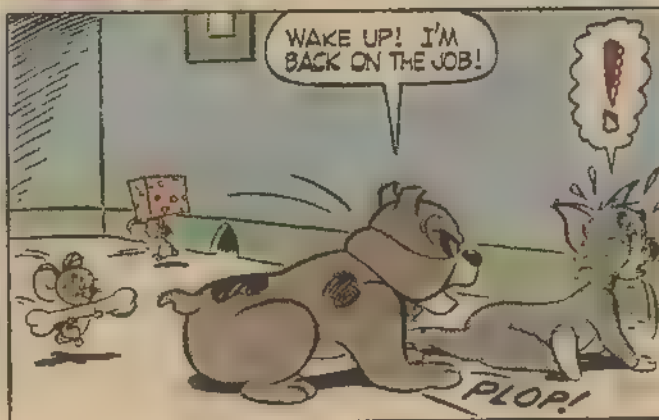

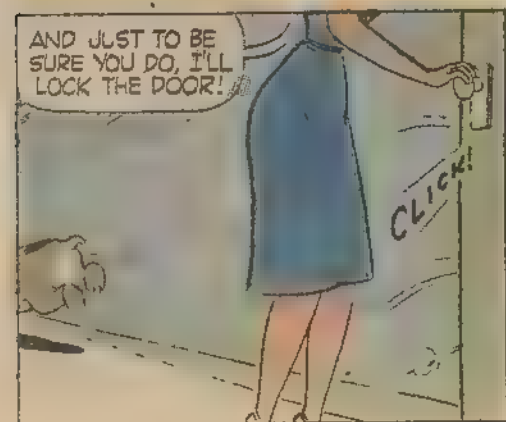

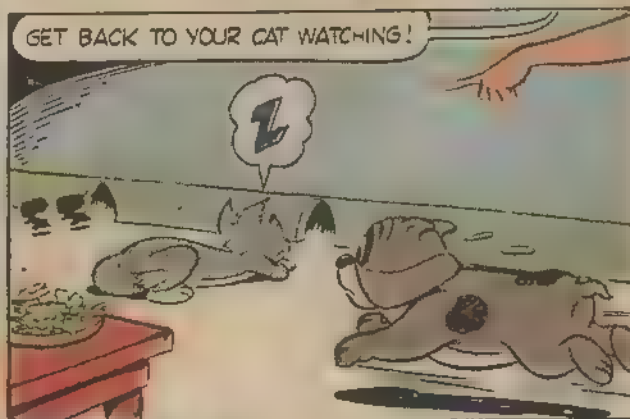

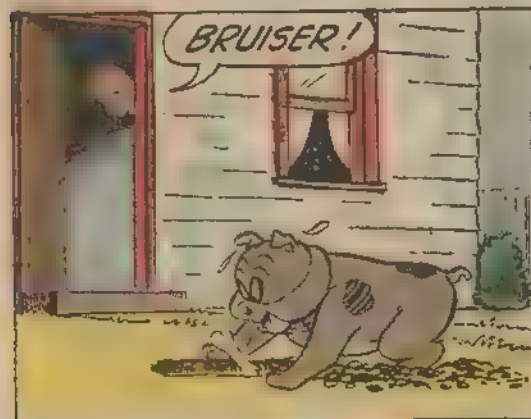

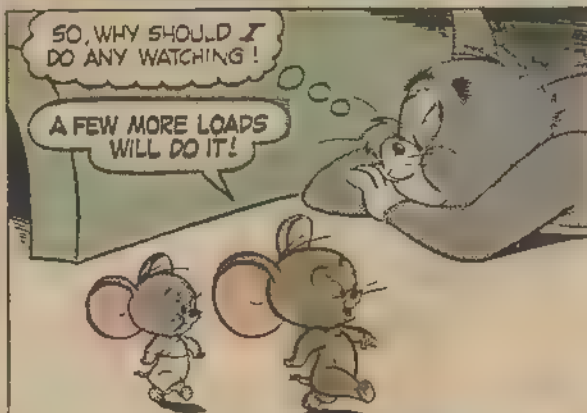

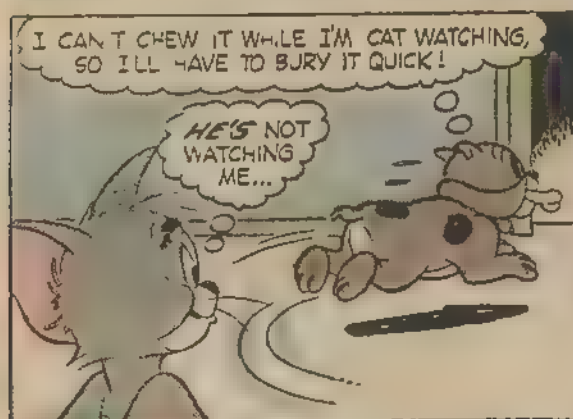

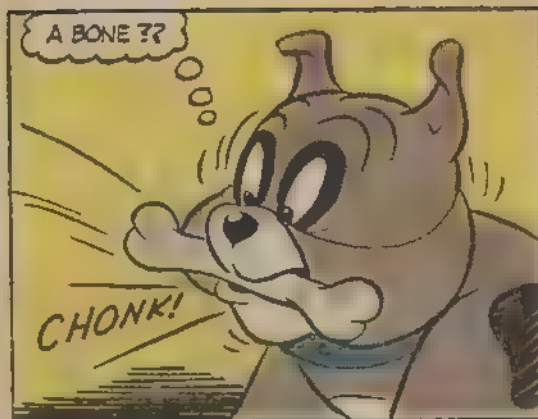

(YAWN!) CAN'T A CAT CATNAP?

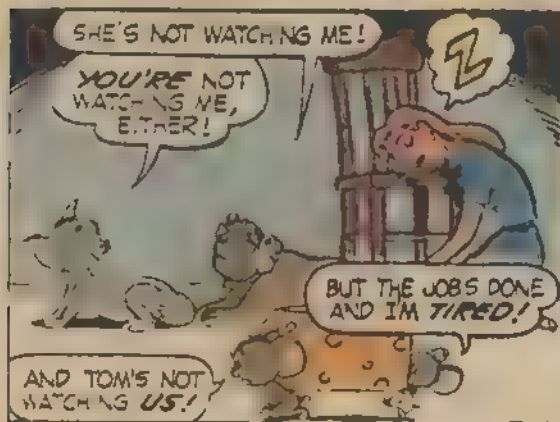

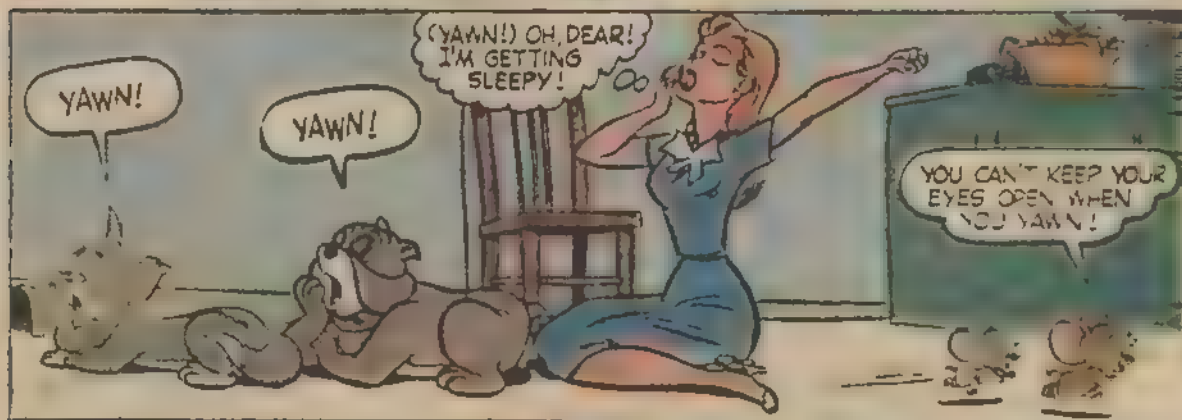

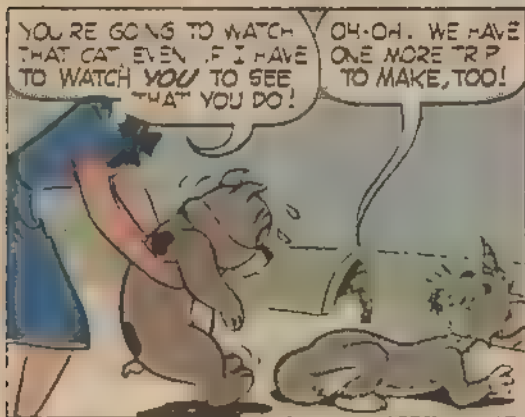

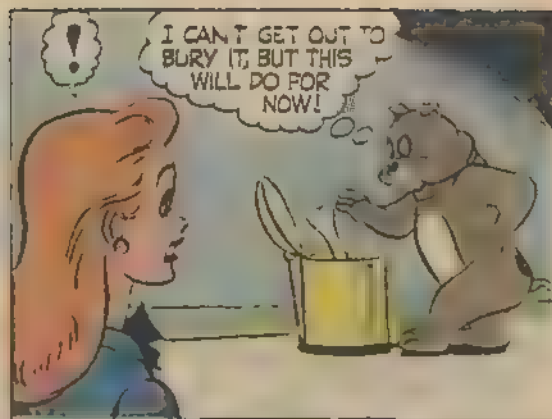

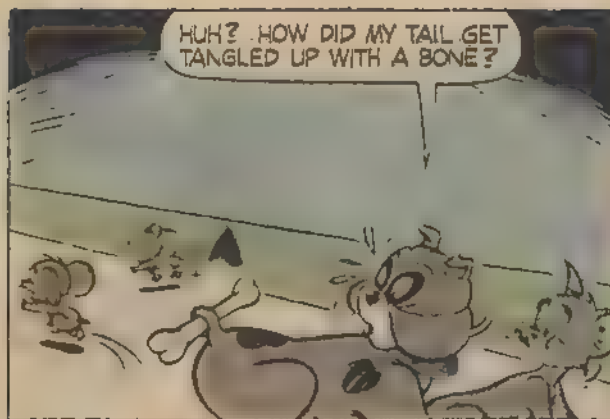

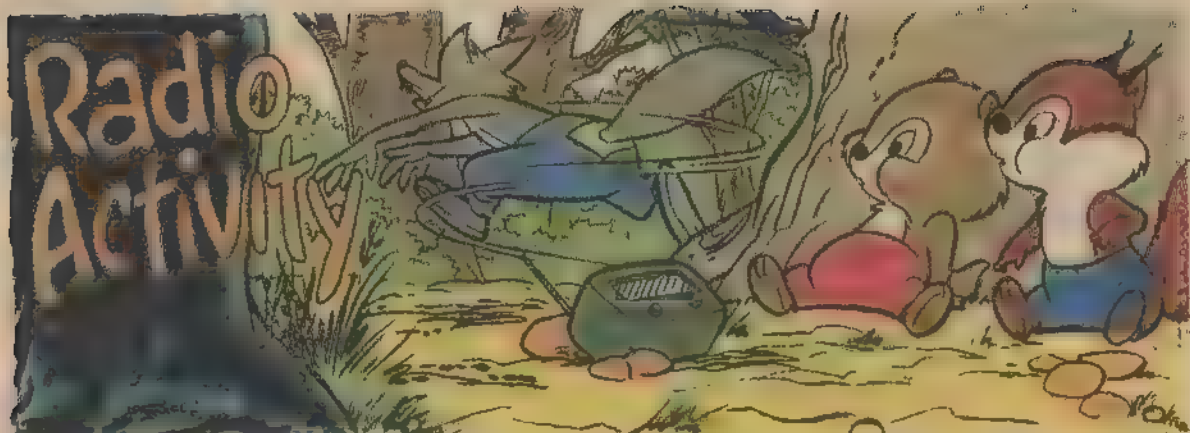

HO HUM! KEEPING MY EYES OPEN WON'T BE EASY!

OH-OH! THERE'S OLD PEEPING TOM!

"Happy days are here again," chanted Wuff the prairie dog as he raced merrily into Sammy Squirrel's home one day.

"And I think it's about time we took that prospecting trip we've been talking about all year!" Sammy exclaimed gaily. "Maybe we can even get away from Charlie Coyote for a while, too."

So the two friends hastily packed tent, pans, food, and other equipment snugly together. Wuff, however, stared in scorn at one item that Sammy was packing.

"Gosh, Sammy," protested Wuff, "we're leaving civilization to prospect up around Fangtooth Mountain. Why do you want to take a portable radio along?"

"I just don't want to miss the Sheriff Jones program that comes on at eight o'clock every night!" Sammy grinned.

"Hmph!" snorted Wuff. "Well, come on then, tenderfoot."

They shouldered their belongings and headed off toward Fangtooth Mountain, which was barely visible in the distance.

After they had tramped for miles, Wuff turned and glanced back over the rocky mountain path they had been climbing. His eyes spotted a slinking figure far below, and he moaned, "Golly, do you see what I see back there on the trail? Here comes that sport, Charlie Coyote, following us!"

"Shucks," snapped Sammy, "why can't he mind his own business?"

Wuff sighed mournfully, "He thinks we are his business. What can we do now?"

"We simply have to outsmart him again, that's all. And I think I know just how to do it," replied Sammy firmly. "Follow me."

First, they waded waist-deep through a rushing mountain stream. Then they scampered determinedly from one tree to another until they collapsed on the ground from weariness.

"That's that!" Wuff wheezed. "Even Charlie Coyote couldn't follow us now. You don't leave a trail in water or air."

"Gee, this place is so nice and quiet," said Sammy. "Let's camp right here."

They hobbled around slowly, almost too tired to fix dinner or set up their tent.

"I'm too sleepy to stay up and listen to the Sheriff Jones program," Sammy yawned as he doused the fire and crawled into bed. Silence and darkness muffled the camp.

A few minutes later, if the boys had not been sleeping so soundly, they would have heard the almost noiseless movement of a stealthy figure sneaking toward their tent.

All of a sudden, something was knocked over, and, immediately, a terrifying burst of harsh voices filled the air. "Don't let him escape!" "Shoot and ask questions later!" "He's over there!" BANG! BANG!

"Don't shoot," the voice of Charlie Coyote whined. "Give me a chance!"

Charlie's noisy, retreating footsteps crashed recklessly through the brush as Sammy and Wuff raced from their tent in pursuit.

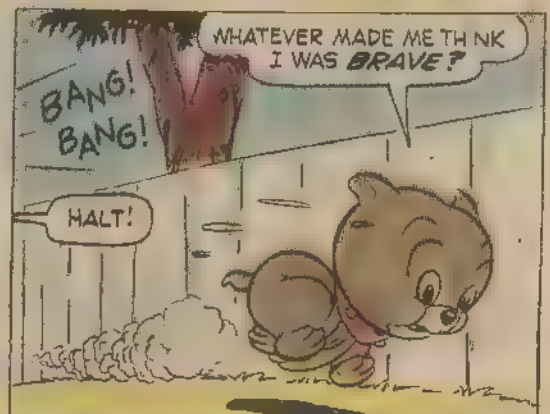

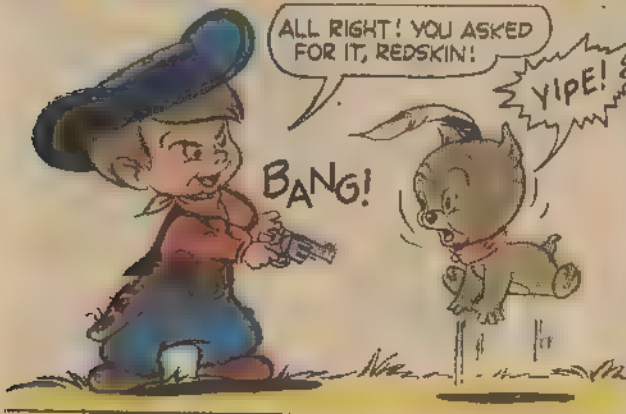

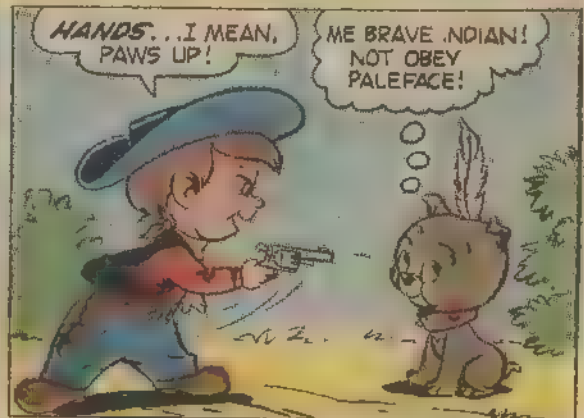

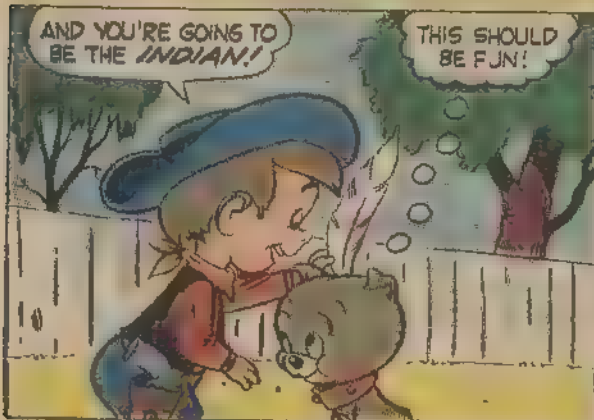

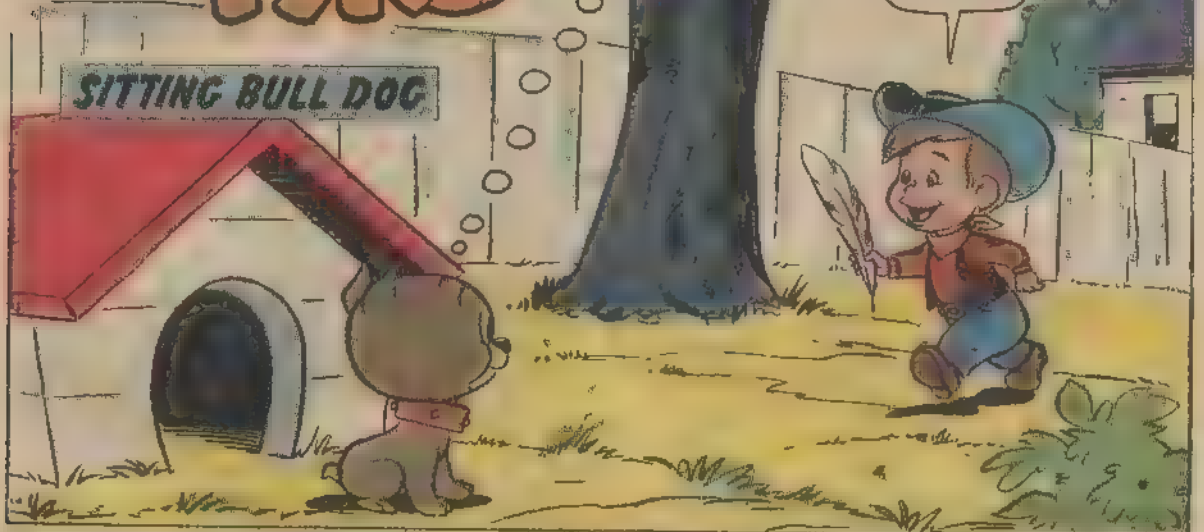

As the sound of frantic flight vanished in the distance, a calm voice said, "And so ends another Sheriff Jones program."

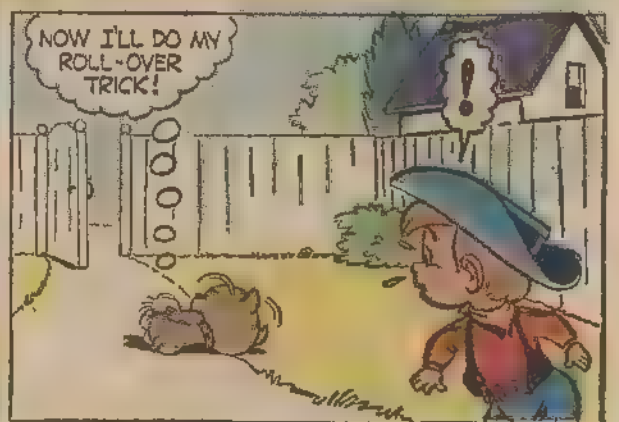

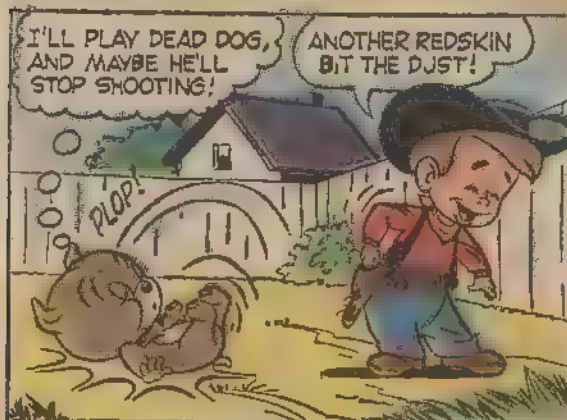

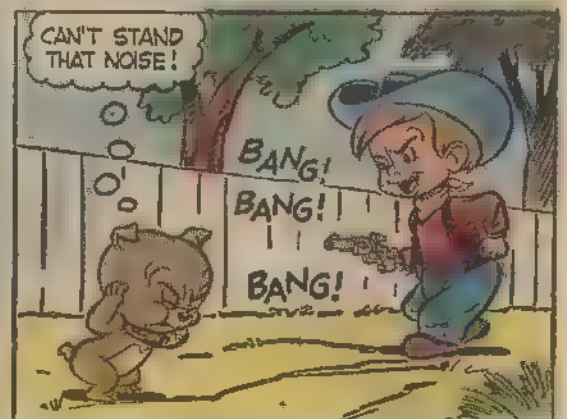

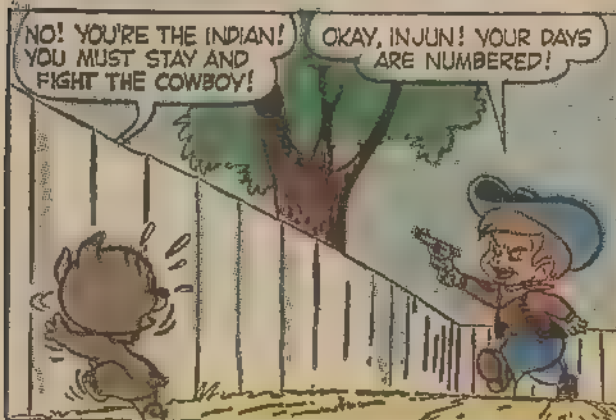

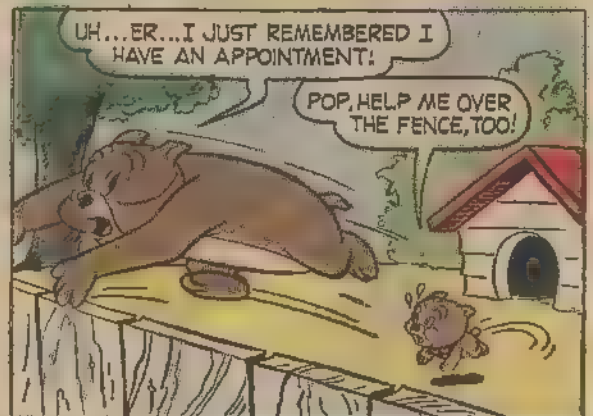

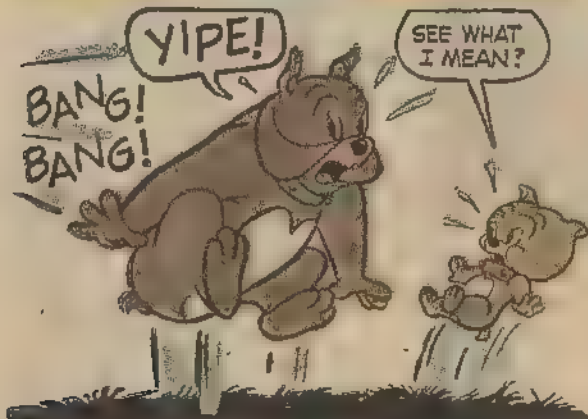

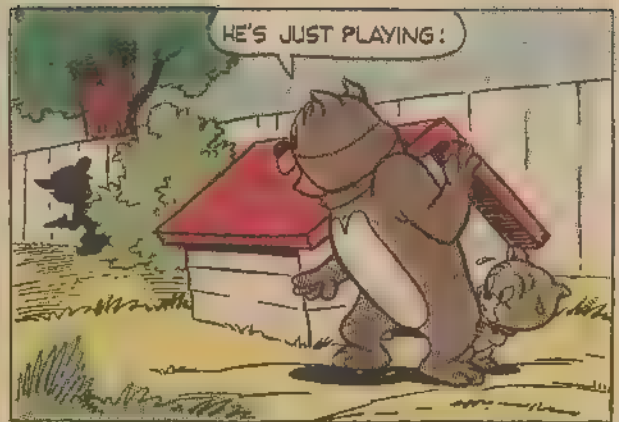

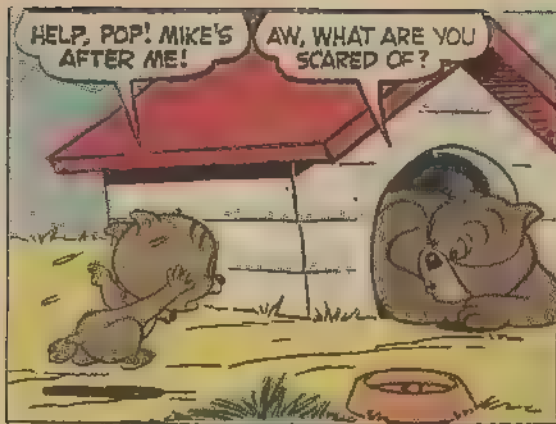

"Charlie did find us, after all," gasped Wuff. "He must have stumbled over the radio and accidentally turned it on while he was sneaking into camp to grab us."

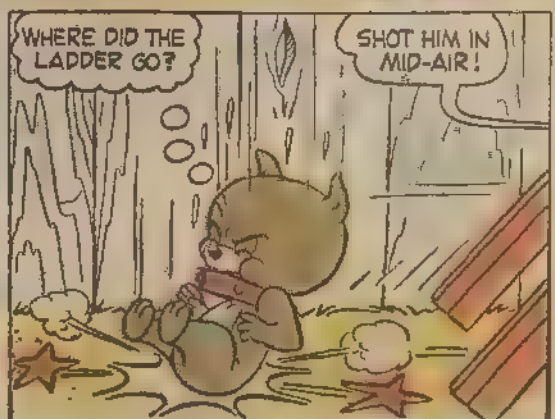

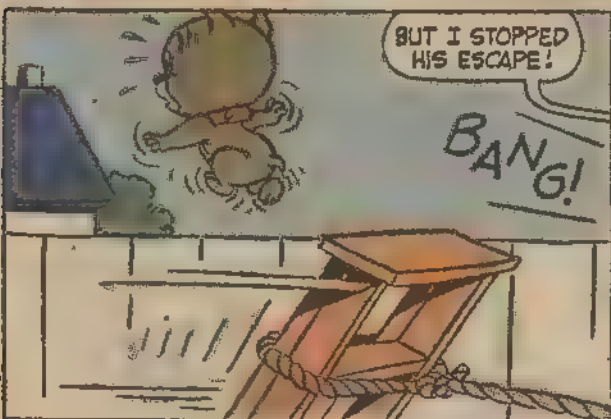

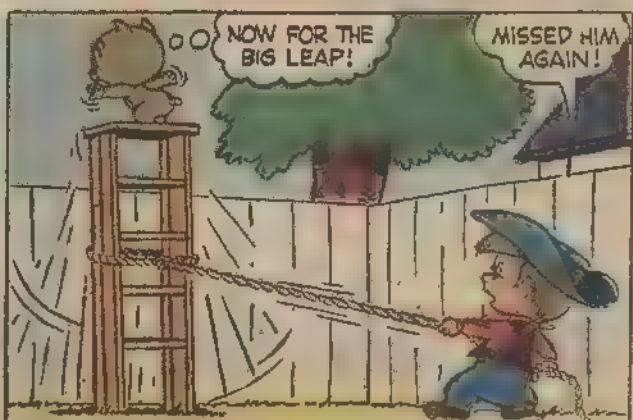

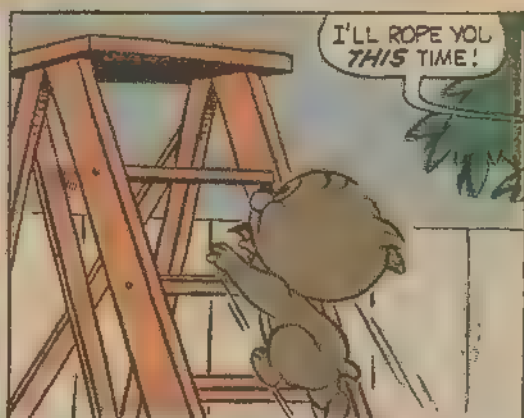

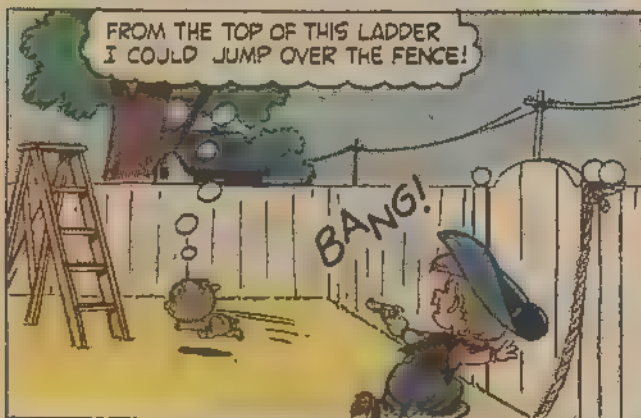

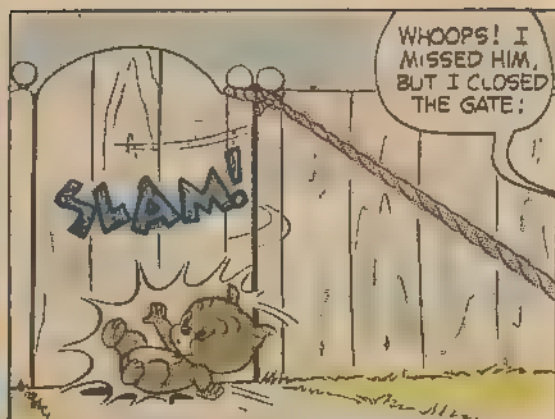

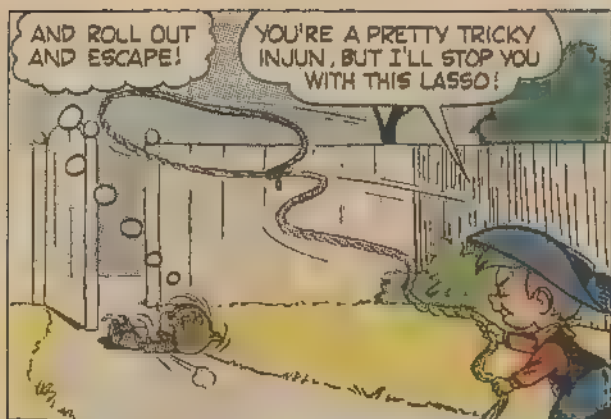

"Yeah," Sammy giggled. "And I'll bet that, as a result, Charlie is the only radioactive coyote in existence."
